

Testimonies from Falluja

an Al Qltaf Artistic Production

“They turned night into day, and day into night. We realized they are not coming to liberate this town.”

This is how a Sheik of a Fallujah mosque describes the relentless US onslaught on his town . . . Fallujah is a community of 400,000 people, most of whom have been permanently displaced and are now living in refugee camps, having seen their homes reduced to rubble.

His testimony is one of a powerful series of personal accounts by the men, women and children of Fallujah. Along with footage and photographs from the city, the testimony brings home the reality of military occupation.

The Soldier's Heart

a Frontline Production

This video explores the psychological cost of war and investigates whether the military is doing enough to help the many combat veterans coming home with emotional problems. With unprecedented access to active duty service members at Camp Pendleton, a Marine base in San Diego, and through interviews with mental health experts both in and out of the military and members of a Camp Pendleton support group, Frontline uncovers one of the underreported stories from the war in Iraq.
