This shocking film by Adam Horowitz reveals, through declassified film footage and government documents, the human radiation experiments kept top secret by the US government for decades.

In 1954 the hydrogen bomb blast named "Bravo" sent fallout over several islands, especially severely impacting the people of Rongelap who were not evacuated, nor told of the need to, during more than 2 full days of exposure. Then in 1957 they were moved back to their island by the US government where for 28 years they resided, fished and farmed on one of the most intensely radiated places on earth.

Commissioned and partially funded by PBS, the film has been pulled from the air every time it was scheduled to be shown by a network affiliate.
